What’s it all about?

World Health Day is a chance to celebrate health and remind world leaders that everyone should be able to access the health care they need, when and where they need it.

Advocacy events will be held around the world to fuel the momentum of the #HealthForAll movement and to highlight our goal of achieving a fairer, healthier world – in which no one is left behind.

The focus will be on equity and solidarity - on raising the bar for health for everyone, everywhere by addressing gaps in services, and leaving no one behind.

The tagline for World Health Day is: Health for all - everyone, everywhere

Why universal health coverage and primary health care?

Universal health coverage means that all people have access to the quality health services they need, when and where they need them, without financial hardship. We believe this is possible and it starts with strong primary health care. Primary health care is a whole-of-society approach to health and well-being centred on the needs and preferences of individuals, families and communities.

To make health for all a reality, governments need to invest in quality, accessible primary health care. Health workers need to care and advocate for patients and educate them on how to get and stay healthy. Individuals and communities need to be empowered to take care of their own health.

Health is a human right. Together, we can make health for all a reality.

Goals

• To improve understanding of universal health coverage and the importance of primary health care as its foundation.

• To spur action from individuals, policy-makers and health-care workers to make universal health care a reality for everyone.
Key messages

• We know universal health coverage is possible, let’s make it happen!

• Health is a human right; it’s time for health for all.

• Universal health coverage means that all people have access to the quality health services they need, when and where they need them, without financial hardship.

• At least half of the people in the world do not receive the health services they need.

• About 100 million people are pushed into extreme poverty each year because of out-of-pocket spending on health.

• But who are these people and how can we help them? To get a better picture of who is missing out, we need data that is broken down by gender, age, income, location, education and other factors that affect access to health services.

• Health is a human right; everyone should have the information and services they need to take care of their own health and the health of their families.

• Quality, accessible primary health care is the foundation for universal health coverage.

• Unsafe and low-quality health care ruins lives and costs the world trillions of dollars every year, we must do more to improve the quality and safety of health services globally.

• Primary health care should be the first level of contact with the health system, where individuals, families and communities receive most of their health care—from promotion and prevention to treatment, rehabilitation and palliative care—as close as possible to where they live and work.

• At its heart, primary health care is about caring for people and helping them improve their health or maintain their well-being, rather than just treating a single disease or condition.

• Primary health care covers the majority of your health needs throughout your life including services such as screening for health problems, vaccines, information on how to prevent disease, family planning, treatment for long- and short-term conditions, coordination with other levels of care, and rehabilitation.

• A health system with strong primary health care delivers better health outcomes, is cost-efficient and improves quality of care.

• Primary health care is a cost-effective and equitable way of delivering health services and helping countries make progress towards universal health coverage.

• Health workers have a crucial role to play educating patients on how to take care of their health, coordinating care and advocating for their patients’ needs to health facility managers and policy-makers.

• Primary health-care workers have a continuing and trusted relationship with their patients and know their health history; knowing the full picture helps improve their care and saves money.

• Primary health-care workers know the traditions, cultures and practices of their communities, making them indispensable during an outbreak or emergency.

• To make health for all a reality, we need: individuals and communities who have access to high quality health services so that they take care of their own health and the health of their families; skilled health workers providing quality, person-centred care; and policy-makers committed to investing in primary health care.

World Health Organization
Visit the World Health Day webpage www.who.int/whd19

Social media squares, posters, infographics, GIFs and videos are available to help you celebrate World Health Day and communicate about universal health coverage and primary health care. Please keep checking back, as more language versions will be added to the multilingual pages of the site (click on the buttons on the top right) in the days leading up to World Health Day on 7 April.

Make sure you check out and share our videos! You can find all of our universal health coverage and primary health care videos on our UHC YouTube playlist here.

For more detailed information about the topics of universal health coverage and primary health care, you can read our fact sheets:

- Universal health coverage fact sheet
- Primary health care fact sheet
Get involved

Events

Another way you can get involved in World Health Day is by joining our Solidarity Chain movement around the world. Gather your colleagues, friends and family, and join hands to show your commitment to universal health coverage. By joining the Solidarity Chain you can join people all over the world, from health workers and policy-makers to nongovernmental organizations and patients, to show your support for health for all. Share the photos and videos of any events you hold on social media using the hashtag #HealthForAll

Calls to action

General public

• Health care is your right and the right of your family, let’s tell our leaders all people deserve quality health care.
• Talk to your local health worker about getting the information and support you need to take care of your own health and the health of your family.
• Quality health care is good for our health, good for economies and good for society. Let’s call on world leaders to make health for all a reality!

Health workers

• You are the voice for your patients. Unite with your peers and let local leaders know that you support health for all.
• Health workers have the power to change people’s lives with quality health advice and care. Let’s make sure everyone can access the skills and expertise of health workers like you.
• Empower your patients to take care of their own health. You play a vital role in learning about their needs and teaching them what they can do to get and stay healthy.

Policy-makers

• Health is a political choice; make sure it is considered in all government policies.
• More investment in primary health care is needed to make universal health coverage a reality; you can make it happen.
• This year, commit to gathering better health data so we can target resources and make changes where they are needed most.

Join the conversation

Follow WHO’s social media channels to get all of the latest World Health Day updates. Don’t forget to use the hashtag #HealthForAll when you share your World Health Day messages.