Investments affect the way food systems function. One action area of the UN Decade of Action on Nutrition focuses on key opportunities to achieve global food security and nutrition targets through conducive agricultural investment policies and programmes.

International financial institutions are taking steps to transform commitments made at the Second International Conference on Nutrition in 2014 into action by mainstreaming nutrition in their agricultural and rural development investments.

The side event will take stock of recent developments aimed at optimizing nutritional returns of agricultural investments. It will review how food supply systems and key policies are linked, and how these policies including financing mechanisms can change food systems to achieve healthier diets and positive behavior changes. Bangladesh and Ethiopia will share their experiences in developing and implementing nutrition-sensitive policies and projects to shape their agricultural investments, and discuss the challenges they are facing (such as data and capacity gaps) in order to strengthen the linkages between agricultural investments and access to and availability of healthy diets.

Aim of the event
To foster better understanding of the Nutrition Decade’s action area on trade and investment for improved nutrition and offer an interactive platform for discussion on the way forward and engagement under the Nutrition Decade.
